

Employee Financial Education

Help your employees make better decisions about their finances and company benefits

Many of your employees may lack financial well-being. This can come in many forms, including employees who have trouble meeting monthly expenses, others who are unable to set aside enough money for an unforeseen emergency, or those who simply have difficulty making informed decisions about their finances.

This lack of financial well-being can add up to a lot of stress affecting your team, impacting both the employees' productivity and the company's bottom-line.

According to a recent study conducted by PwC¹, 35% of employees are distracted at work by personal financial issues; and 49% of those employees say they spend three or more hours at work each week dealing with personal financial issues.

Employees look to the employer for support

Employers provide a suite of traditional benefits to their employees. Health and medical coverage, defined contribution plans, such as a 401(k), and voluntary benefits, like life and disability income insurance, are all important tools employees need for financial security.

24% of employees say their employer offers services to assist them with personal finances, and more than two-thirds (71%) say they've used the services.¹

Unfortunately, the lack of employee financial well-being can also lead to the ill-considered use of the benefits you offer. Employees may choose too much or too little coverage, select plan options that don't match their needs, or opt-out of participation altogether due to a lack of understanding. This can leave your employees unprepared for the unexpected.

Employee financial education

A number of companies today are including financial education as a no-cost benefit for their employees. According to a recent study by MassMutual[®], companies that do offer financial education do so for a number of reasons beyond enhanced employee financial well-being. Companies surveyed cite financial education as a way to also to help the company improve employee morale, reduce turnover and attract new talent.²

Providing comprehensive financial education is a great way to help your employees get the knowledge and insight they need to make better financial decisions. This can result in a more engaged and productive workforce that is able to make the most of the benefits you offer.
