Dear Nuvolat End Customers, Leasing Companies or Secured Creditors:

I am writing to follow-up on my prior correspondence regarding Nuvolat Cloud Group ("Nuvolat"). Over the past six weeks, CoreSite has expended a great amount of time, resources and money (including the cost of power) to allow Nuvolat customers and creditors to move their equipment from the Nuvolat Space. We did this, despite the fact that Nuvolat ceased all correspondence with CoreSite in early July and stopped paying its service fees months ago.

We received inquiries from a number of entities after our original notice to customers and creditors. We were able to confirm ownership of some of the equipment located at our data centers and facilitate transfer of possession. Unfortunately, in most instances, the serial numbers or proof of ownership documentation that we received from Nuvolat customers and creditors does not match the serial numbers of equipment within our data centers. As a result, our employees have spent hundreds of hours attempting to locate equipment through other methods and unite Nuvolat customers and creditors with equipment they claim a right to possess.

CoreSite has done all it can in its limited role as Nuvolat's landlord. We are not in a position, nor are we willing to incur the additional costs and time required, to untangle the muddle Nuvolat has left behind. That task is best suited for a bankruptcy trustee, receiver or some other neutral party.

As previously mentioned, we began disconnecting power to equipment in the Nuvolat space at 6:00 PM (local time) on August 10, 2020. CoreSite has a right to remove and dispose of the equipment under our contracts with Nuvolat. By this letter, CoreSite provides notice that any servers and other equipment located in the Nuvolat space of a CoreSite data center is considered abandoned. We will store such servers and equipment for five weeks from today's date, after which time period we will sell it at public or private sale or dispose of it.

We sympathize with Nuvolat's customers and creditors and share the frustration caused by Nuvolat's lack of correspondence or communication.

Please contact info@coresite.com with any questions.

Kind regards,

Tanya L. Flink
