CEO Maryam Ghahremani comments:

2018 was a year of change for Bambuser with a completely new management and chairman of the board and partly new board members. Since I started as CEO in March 2018, we have changed and slimmed the organization and positioned the company for a restart. We have redone much of our brand profile and removed the brand Iris to instead focus all our resources on our original brand Bambuser.

In early April we presented a new “Go-to-market” strategy with a focus on digital sales and after the launch in August we have gained growth in our digital channels. We will continue to sell Bambuser as a platform, but after being live for four months, the average revenue per user (ARPU) for these new customers has been low and did not meet our expectations.

We have therefore started an exploration phase in order to identify new areas, where Bambuser’s live video component can be vital. Among the areas we are now exploring are Live Commerce e-commerce solutions. Video is also already a frequently used medium in e-commerce, not least through influencers and social media. Our product team has now started to develop a foundation that will help us make our video platform a viable option in this, for us, new market.

Thanks to our new strategy, we have our ears to the ground, which helps us perceive the prevailing market trend and will give us better conditions for further developing our platform and focusing our sales resources. There is a lot going on in the market now and we are determined to be an important supplier of the engine behind many live video applications in coming years.

I look forward to an exciting 2019!
