Students were graded on a group portfolio which constituted a notable outcome. Ratings received from group members, and the written self-reflection within the tool.

Learning objectives

- Students are able to critically evaluate the whole process, including the group-work and the group process.
- The instructor decided to start using this tool in order to give students a chance to learn that individual contributions recognized in the group work context. It was important to gain more oversight into the group dynamics in the new online course setup, where face-to-face interactions were not possible.

Learning activities

- According to Bloom’s Taxonomy, learning activities were mainly at the level of analyzing, applying, and evaluating.
- The instructor put extra attention towards setting up the course in Canvas in a way which was clear and comprehensive for students to understand. The complete course saw 13 students undertake a complex group project, which is master program research and design project.
- In these projects, scientific and out-of-the-box interventions master program, this research and design course were split among four groups and tasked on addressing a real-life problem by designing a digital behaviour change intervention. In these projects, meaningful and specific self-reflections, creative and critical thinking, and entrepreneurship were encouraged.

Assessment of learning outcomes

- Students were graded on a group portfolio which constituted a notable outcome. Ratings received from group members, and the written self-reflection within the tool.
- The instructor was impressed that, despite it not being a large part of their grade, students often wrote genuine and personal reflections about their learning process.
- The instructor was impressed, it explicitly not being a large part of their grade, students often wrote genuine and personal reflections about their learning process. To be honest, I was really impressed. I really saw genuine reflections about their learning process. To be honest, I was really impressed.