

PEOPLE GIVING TO PEOPLE

An update on how gifts are changing lives in PMMA communities

PLANNING FOR THE FUTURE

A donor's story

We often hear from donors, "I wish I could do more to support the PMMA mission." Many are surprised to discover that through estate planning, they can have a tremendous philanthropic impact on PMMA's future, while still caring for their own financial needs along the way.

Karen Smith (right), an independent living resident at The Westerly on PMMA's Wichita campus, plans to give back to the place that has meant so much to her during retirement. Karen made provisions in her will to benefit Wichita Presbyterian Manor.

"When I came here in 2015, they promised I would be cared for, for the rest of my life, even if I ran out of money," Karen said. "I have saved all my life, but I am not a millionaire, and that security has been a comfort. I decided that leaving my estate to Wichita Presbyterian Manor was a good option. I want to leave anything I have left to someone else who came here with the promise of being cared for, for the rest of their life."

Karen's estate planning still leaves her plenty of options while she is living.

"There is not a restriction as to how I spend," she said. "I started traveling, took a break during the pandemic, and plan to start up again when it is safe. This is a good time in my life."

Karen, a retired nurse practitioner, began envisioning what she wanted life to be like in retirement while she was still in the throes of her career. After discovering Wichita Presbyterian Manor, she knew it would be the right place to live out the rest of her life.

While many of Karen's activities were put on hold during the pandemic, she also knew that living at PMMA meant there was help if she needed it. She would be safe and cared for, no matter what.

"I don't have any children and I have too many nieces and nephews to count," Karen said. "I didn't want anyone to have to take care of Aunt Karen. At PMMA, I have independence. Everyone I need is here, everything I need is here."
