Alicia Roman's work explores the complexities of family history, tradition and life's mysteries through the use of patinas, natural elements and found objects. Inspired by old family photo albums, she developed an interest in photography and began to contextualize vintage pictures into metaphorical narratives. Collage, printmaking, papermaking, and bookbinding led to a love of combining various patterns and text into storytelling. The intaglio process attracted her not only to the quality of the incised marks on the paper, but the deeply etched surfaces of the metal plates. All of these elements influenced her eventual connection to jewelry making, incorporating textured metals, torn book pages, dyed lenses, and bits from nature to tell a tale.

She graduated from the Corcoran School of Art and has participated in numerous classes and workshops both as a learner and teacher. Her work has shown internationally and is in many private collections. She lives in Alexandria, VA where she continues to make art and teach.
