Crisis Response and Tabletop Exercising

Tabletop exercises are facilitated discussion sessions where team members meet in an informal virtual or classroom setting to discuss and evaluate individual's roles, test plans and responses during an emergency to establish their effectiveness. Managing crises and crisis communications is an essential element of all organisational responses. Exercises, linked to expert consultancy help test and develop security and safety planning and processes. It is important that when conducting exercises all staff are engaged at operational, tactical and strategic levels. Exercises are a cost-effective way to test established plans. Consistently Inquiries and post incident reviews of terrorist attack and major incidents have highlighted the fundamental need to test and refine plans and apply the learning. CAMOR is well placed to assist organisations plan and host exercises, and evaluate the findings from these exercises.

Benefits of Tabletop Exercising

- Tests staff regarding application of training they have received.
- Prepares individuals and organisations for unexpected or unanticipated crises (far better to fail in a simulated exercise than in a real unfolding crisis).
- Allows process, procedures and places to be tested in the cold light of day e.g. evacuation plans, bomb/firearms response plans management.
- Allows staff members to work with others in a 'safe' environment and allows them to get to know each other face to face rather than by digital means.
- Trains leaders to 'lead'.
- Instills a baseline confidence in crisis response, enhancing defensible decision making.
