Klingbrief is a newsletter from the Klingenstein Center for Independent College Admission, an educational advisory service. The purpose of the newsletter is to keep teachers and educators informed about the latest developments in education and to encourage them to maintain high standards in their work.

In this issue, the newsletter explores the issue of teacher retention and the need for better compensation and working conditions for teachers. The newsletter also features articles on the importance of creative teaching methods, the need for professional development for teachers, and the role of technology in education.

The newsletter includes articles on the work of experts in the field of education, such as Paul Presser, who discusses the importance of creative teaching methods, and Bruce A. Shaw, who explores the role of technology in education.

In addition to these articles, the newsletter includes a section on educational resources, including links to websites and online courses that can help teachers improve their skills and knowledge.

Overall, the Klingbrief newsletter provides a valuable resource for teachers and educators who are looking to stay informed about the latest developments in education and to improve their skills and knowledge.
