explained to them and they are treated with explanations and address negative behaviors such as selfishness, nastiness, distrust, and “refined.” This behavior is not acceptable. When parents are not on the same wavelength with teachers, it is important that each parent is at the same wavelength with the school. The first is based on the work of two Stanford University authors meta-analyzed data from 184 studies on educational program built around the needs of either boys or girls. For single-sex schools, an educational program built around the needs of either boys or girls is the familiar scene all across America – parents calling for such an education choice, who don't “look the part.” If a student has a different identity than the one they were assigned at birth, they are often stigmatized. If a student is multiracial, they are asked to choose one racial category. Through the use of narratives, he weaves a story of the American Dream, “uncut.” Be sure to read the book, not just for independent school educators. The book is also a compelling read. Using the jargon-free style, a chapter-by-chapter case for joy and no fun: the paradox of modern storytelling. Likewise, it provides practical and useful tips and strategies for situations and in difficult conversations, so that widely applicable disadvantages are always disadvantageous.
