School Leadership provides graduate programs and professional development for independent school educators. By offering hands-on and in-depth content, the Klingenstein Scholars Program is designed to provide educators, who are typically unaffiliated with colleges and universities, with a foundation of expertise.

Klingbrief is a free, monthly publication of recommended articles, books, research reports and blogs, as well as biographies of independent school educators and alumni, and notes from the Klingenstein Center. It is intended to be a resource to help propel education toward social change and success for all students.

A Case for Talking about Sex with Teenagers

Megan Simmons, a teacher, writes compellingly and persuasively about braving what is ostensibly “adult” literature. The topic is expansive and encompasses sex talk in the literature classroom. Ultimately, Simmons says, “If students don’t be bolder, braver, smarter and safer, [students] need to be comprised of short, often pithy stories of self-motivation and of approach: we can all be one-person schoolhouses. Stark’s “handbook for learning anything” is comprised of short, often pithy stories of self-motivation and of approach: we can all be one-person schoolhouses.
