What is College Promise?

College Promise is the commitment to fund and support a quality college education for every eligible hardworking student advancing on the path to earn a college degree, a certificate, and/or credits that transfer to a four-year university, regardless of race, ethnicity, gender, country of origin, religion, socioeconomic status, or zip code. A Promise is an assurance made to prepare students for the 21st-century workforce, civic life, and the pursuit of the American Dream without the burden of unmanageable college debt. And a Promise is a trust to make the first two years of community college – at a minimum – as universal, free, and accessible as public high school has been in the 20th century.

While College Promise programs vary across the country, most share a few common features. First, Promise programs have an explicit policy to engage students, institutions, policymakers, and the public on the importance of post-secondary education. Second, Promise stakeholders send a clear message that college is attainable for every eligible hardworking student on the path to earn a college degree, a certificate, and/or credits that transfer to a four-year university, starting in America’s community colleges. And third, in addition to providing the financial award and stakeholder framework for post-secondary education, quality Promise programs acknowledge that support services and teaching excellence are critical to college quality and success.
About this Catalog

This catalog represents the significant effort of the national College Promise organization in Washington, D.C. to identify College Promise programs across the nation and describe their key features to produce more opportunities and greater outcomes for our nation’s students. Many Promise programs are specific to a location—“place-based”—to drive community impacts by increasing student success. While many fund and support a wide range of certificate and degree options, some are more highly targeted to meet in-demand workforce needs in specific areas, enabling students to develop employable skills at little or no cost. To launch the catalog, we began with a deep dive into our internal database of Promise programs, as well as identifying Promise programs through direct outreach, media reports, and our Financial Sustainability surveys.

Drawing from the various Promise definitions put forth by the University of Pennsylvania’s Alliance for Higher Education and Democracy, the Upjohn Institute for Employment Research, WestED, and Research for Action, as well as important work published by the Education Trust, the Century Foundation, the Institution for Higher Education Policy, the Education Commission of the States, MDRC, and research scholars studying Promise programs, our working definition includes Promise programs that have the following key features:

- Promise Programs can use a mix of federal (Pell Grants), state, and local funding from private and/or public sources to cover tuition and fees.
- General education and/or vocational programs from accredited, state-approved degree and certificate-granting U.S. institutions are included as eligible Promise programs. (Note that this distinction differs from other definitions.)
- Grade point average (GPA) requirements are between 0-3.0 GPA; student entry requirements above 3.0 are not considered Promise.
- State financial aid programs that are first dollar will be considered supporting the Promise. First dollar state financial aid programs have important equity implications; with first dollar state financial aid, Pell Grants can be used to cover additional costs associated with college (e.g., textbooks, transportation, childcare, housing, etc.).
- First dollar dual-enrollment programs where postsecondary tuition is covered by the state, will be considered Promise. Dual enrollment programs where a student has to pay are not considered Promise.
- Promise Programs should seek to provide additional supports to ensure student success, especially for low-income and first-generation students.

- A public website where Promise programs commit to eliminating tuition and state approved fees for certificate and/or two- and/or four-year undergraduate baccalaureate degree programs.
The national College Promise organization, in collaboration with the College Promise Research Network, continues to refine its definition of quality Promise programs based on emerging research and evidence from the field on key features, such as student supports. As the College Promise movement continues to grow, we want to make sure students throughout the United States are aware of the programs available to them in local communities and states. We seek to provide useful information about each program, including its eligibility requirements, the college(s) committed to the Promise, any support services provided, and whether a student may attend college full or part-time to receive the Promise. Additionally, we provide each program’s website and contact information to help students, their families, teachers, school counselors, and others take the next step in learning more about applicable programs and their application requirements. The catalog organizes Promise programs alphabetically by state. Promise programs listed as Statewide means that geographic eligibility enables eligible students from anywhere in the state to apply. For the purposes of this catalog, a Statewide Promise may be administered or directly funded by the state, but may also be passed through to local communities or institutions that meet state accountability requirements. For a list of state-administered Promise programs, see Appendix A. The following resources may be helpful as students and families explore their post-secondary options.
