In Wales, a maximum of two lodgers can reside in a property before it's considered an HMO under the Housing Act 2004 schedule 14(6). In England, a lodger refers to someone who lives with you in your home, often a friend or family member. A lodger agreement is a contract signed by both the landlord and lodger for shared living space. The key difference between a tenant and lodger is that a lodger resides on a property where the landlord also lives. In the UK, a lodger agreement outlines points like rent, additional bills, taxes, rights during occupancy, and dates for starting and ending occupancy. When evicting a lodger in the UK, you must provide reasonable notice to move out, which can range from days to weeks. Before any financial arrangements are made, it's essential to clarify expectations with potential lodgers. To avoid conflicts later on, consider the following key points: rent terms, including frequency and due dates; deposit details, including its purpose and refund process; and utility bill responsibilities. Additionally, think about insurance coverage, extra services like laundry or meals, and facilities like Council Tax. Define cleaning responsibilities and schedules, as well as smoking and pet policies. Establish boundaries for the property, parking options, and guest limits, including overnight visitors. Consider implementing an "overnight guests rule" to maintain a comfortable living environment. Formalize these agreements in writing to avoid misunderstandings later on.
