I see people having trouble with the tower so here's some advice: 1) assume next card will be a pig, calculate cost, and compare it to what you currently have. If it's worth continuing, keep going; if not, exit immediately. Example: you have 50 gems, 80 feathers, 10 pearls, and two spell cards. You already spent 20 gems so your cost for continuing is 120 gems. Ask yourself whether the current resources are worth the 70 gems needed to continue. If you follow this strategy, you will never make a loss. To optimize gameplay in ToF, I'm employing a straightforward card-picking strategy: consistently choosing the same card across all rounds in every game. This approach may not offer any significant advantages over other methods but saves me time. The most frustrating aspects of ToF are: 1. The pig's consistent appearance, particularly after the first round. In my experience, it occurs almost every other round, unlike the predicted 1-in-5 chance. Additionally, hitting a pig on the third round is relatively common. 2. A more concerning issue: accumulating rewards only to hit a pig and lose them all. This happens when you've progressed to level 10-15, thinking you've earned enough, but then you get hit with another pig. Interestingly, the probability of avoiding pigs for six rounds or hitting one on the second round is similar (.18). Some users have shared their experiences: - @cognitive encountered three pigs on the first floor. - Others have confirmed that getting a pig in the first round is less frequent than predicted. Observations: 1. Many players hit the first pig before reaching the fifth floor/level. 2. Some encounter two pigs before the fifth floor, which leads to frustration. Players' strategies vary based on their gem count and willingness to spend real money. Some are more cautious, while others take calculated risks. Our approach to data protection.
